Computer program that verifies written text for grammatical correctness AbiWord checks English grammar using link grammar. A grammar checker, in computing terms, is a program, or part of a program, that attempts to verify written text for grammatical correctness. Grammar checkers are most often implemented as a feature of a larger program, such as a word processor, but are also available as a stand-alone application that can be activated from within programs that work with editable text. The implementation of a grammar checker makes use of natural language processing.[1][2] The earliest "grammar checkers" were programs that checked for punctuation and style inconsistencies, rather than a complete range of possible grammatical errors. The first system was called Writer's Workbench, and was a set of writing tools included with Unix systems as far back as the 1970s.[3][4] The whole Writer's Workbench package included several separate tools to check for various writing problems. The "diction" tool checked for wordy, trite, clichéd or misused phrases in text. The tool would output a list of questionable phrases, and provide suggestions for improving the writing. The "style" tool analyzed the writing style of a given text. It performed a number of readability tests on the text and output the results, and gave some statistical information about the sentences of the text. Aspen Software of Albuquerque, New Mexico released the earliest version of a diction and style checker for personal computers, Grammatik, in 1981. Grammatik was first available for a Radio Shack - TRS-80, and soon had versions for CP/M and the IBM PC. Reference Software International of San Francisco, California, acquired Grammatik in 1985. Development of Grammatik continued, and it became an actual grammar checker that could detect writing errors beyond simple style checking. Other early diction and style checking programs included Punctuation & Style, Correct Grammar, RightWriter and PowerEdit.[5] While all the earliest programs started out as simple diction and style checkers, all eventually added various levels of language processing, and developed some level of true grammar checking capability. Until 1992, grammar checkers were sold as add-on programs. There were a large number of different word processing programs available at that time, with WordPerfect and Microsoft Word the top two in market share. In 1992, Microsoft decided to add grammar checking as a feature of Word, and licensed CorrectText, a grammar checker from Houghton Mifflin that had not yet been marketed as a standalone product. WordPerfect answered Microsoft's move by acquiring Reference Software, and the direct descendant of Grammatik is still included with WordPerfect. As of 2019, grammar checkers are built into systems like Google Docs and Sapling.ai,[6] browser extensions like Grammarly and Qordoba, desktop applications like Ginger, free and open-source software like LanguageTool,[7] and text editor plugins like those available from WebSpellChecker Software. The earliest writing style programs checked for wordy, trite, clichéd, or misused phrases in a text. This process was based on simple pattern matching. The heart of the program was a list of many hundreds or thousands of phrases that are considered poor writing by many experts. The list of questionable phrases included alternative wording for each phrase. The checking program would simply break text into sentences, check for any matches in the phrase dictionary, flag suspect phrases and show an alternative. These programs could also perform some mechanical checks. For example, they would typically flag doubled words, doubled punctuation, some capitalization errors, and other simple mechanical mistakes. The grammar checking is more complex. While a programming language has a very specific syntax and grammar, this is not so for natural languages. One can write a somewhat complete formal grammar for a natural language, but there are usually so many exceptions in real usage that a formal grammar is of minimal help in writing a grammar checker. One of the most important parts of a natural language grammar checker is a dictionary of all the words in the language, along with the part of speech of each word. The fact that a natural word may be used as any one of several parts of speech (such as "free" being used as an adjective, adverb, noun, or verb) greatly increases the complexity of any grammar checker. A grammar checker will find each sentence in a text, look up each word in the dictionary, and then attempt to parse the sentence into a form that matches a grammar. Using various rules, the program can then detect various errors, such as agreement in tense, number, word order, and so on. It is also possible to detect some stylistic problems with the text. For example, some popular style guides such as The Elements of Style deprecate excessive use of the passive voice. Grammar checkers may attempt to identify passive sentences and suggest an active-voice alternative. The software elements required for grammar checking are closely related to some of the development issues that need to be addressed for speech recognition software. In voice recognition, parsing can be used to help predict which word is most likely intended, based on part of speech and position in the sentence. In grammar checking, the parsing is used to detect words that fail to follow accepted grammar usage. Recently,[when?] research has focused on developing algorithms which can recognize grammar errors based on the context of the surrounding words.[clarification needed] Grammar checkers are considered as a type of foreign language writing aid which non-native speakers can use to proofread their writings as such programs endeavor to identify syntactical errors.

(8) However, as with other computerized writing aids such as spell checkers, popular grammar checkers are often criticized when they fail to spot errors and incorrectly flag correct text as erroneous. The linguist Geoffrey K. Pullum argued in 2007 that they were generally so inaccurate as to do more harm than good: "for the most part, accepting the advice of a computer grammar checker on your prose will make it much worse, sometimes hilariously incoherent."[9] Spell checker Link grammar ^ Vikrant Bhatija; João Manuel R.S. Unveil the power of RewriterPro.ai and transform your writing with AI sophistication! Effortlessly polish sentences, optimize structure, and improve flow to engage your readers. Try our AI Rewriter and see your content sparkle like never before! How do you check if a sentence is a run-on? A run-on sentence is a grammatically incorrect sentence in which two or more independent clauses are combined into one sentence without appropriate punctuation or conjunctions. For instance, "John went to the store he bought some apples" is a run-on sentence. The correct sentence will be: John went to the store, and he bought some apples. What are the 3 types of run-on sentences?The major types of run-on sentences are: a fused sentence (when two or more clauses are combined without punctuation), a comma splice (when independent clauses are joined using only a comma and without proper punctuation), and a polysyndeton (when there are too many or unnecessary conjunctions in a sentence). How can I check for fragment sentences online for free?You can use Sentence Checkup's free sentence checker tool to check for fragment sentences and correct them for enhanced clarity. How can I check if my sentence is correct or not? Sentence Checkup's free grammar checker allows you to check your sentences for grammatical errors and correct them with a single click. What are the 5 rules to fix a run-on sentence? The 5 common rules to correct a run-on sentence include: using a period, using a comma and an appropriate conjunction, adding a transitional word, using a semicolon, and using a subordinating conjunction. Is a run-on sentence incomplete?A run-on sentence isn't necessarily incomplete; it improperly joins two or more complete clauses without correct punctuation or conjunctions. It's an error of excess, not deficiency, containing complete clauses incorrectly connected. The issue is generally with grammar and structure, not incomplete information. What is the difference between a fragment and a run-on?A sentence fragment is an incomplete thought or clause that lacks either a subject, a verb, or a complete idea, making it grammatically incomplete. On the other hand, a run-on sentence contains two or more complete thoughts or independent clauses that are improperly joined without correct punctuation or conjunctions. While a fragment lacks essential elements of a sentence, a run-on sentence has all the elements but connects them incorrectly. Active & Passive voice errorsMany people think that any particular sentence that consists of verbs like is, was, were, etc. is a passive voice but this is not actually true. A sentence that will be converted to a passive voice should have an object.Active voice: "The history class witnessed the fort."The Passive voice transformation.Incorrect: "The history class has witnessed the fort."Correct: "The fort was witnessed by the history class."Always keep in mind that all passive voice sentences have a form of a verb like was, were, etc., but not all sentences that consist of those verbs are passive. We should have to be very careful while writing passive voice sentences in our articles.2. Spelling MistakesThis tool efficiently identifies and removes spelling mistakes. Spelling mistakes in an essay or article create a very bad impact on the mind of readers. The content should be clean from all types of spelling mistakes.Incorrect: "Jonas can dive in the see."Correct: "Jonas can dive in the sea."Spelling mistakes can easily be avoided if articles and content should be revised properly. Usually, most of the spelling mistakes will occur if the article is not revised properly.3. Redundant ExpressionThe redundant expression is nothing but using the same keywords or words repeatedly whose meanings are the same. The redundant expression should be avoided as much as possible. They will affect the efficiency of the paragraph.Incorrect: "We can completely book the hotel floor fully."Correct: "We can completely book the hotel floor."The above incorrect expression will create a sense of redundancy. The meaning of the words "completely" and "fully" is the same but both words occurred in the sentence for the same context. Our tool removes this type of errors very precisely.4. Verbs and Tenses mistakesThe mistakes of tenses are very common in English writing. Proper knowledge about tenses can reduce these mistakes. The proper form of verbs should be used depending on the scenario. Our tool takes care of this too.Incorrect: "We have a great party yesterday."Correct: "We had a great party yesterday."5. Comma splices or fragmentationOnline sentence correction is very important for sentences to be fragmented in a proper way. The writer should clearly identify where the sentence fragmentation is needed and where to use it.So, a comma should be inserted where necessary. Our comma checker also takes care of this type of mistake.Incorrect: "If you are not out there. Get me a coffee."Correct: "If you are out there, get me a coffee."6. Ambiguous Pronoun ReferencesAmbiguous usage of references of the pronoun can also affect the beauty of sentences. The writer should properly use pronoun references in sentences.Incorrect: "Janice had a meeting with Tom, but he couldn't meet her."Correct: "Janice had a meeting with Tom, but Tom couldn't meet Janice."It makes a sense of ambiguity in the mind of the reader who couldn't meet.Frequently Asked QuestionsHow to check if a sentence is grammatically correct?To check if a sentence is grammatically correct, it will highlight all typos if your sentence has, along with their correct suggestions.What is the best grammar checker?Prepostseo grammar checker is the best free grammar checker due to the following factors:Free online availabilityNo signup or registration is requiredNo daily usage limitNo word count limitEquipped with AI technologyWhy is a grammar checker important?A Grammar Checker is important as it ensures that your writing is clear, precise, and professional to read.
